In communities across the US, health care providers are scrambling to create “Accountable Care Organizations,” in response to health reform. Hospitals, physician groups, and insurers are major stakeholders in these efforts, and often see themselves as the primary source of either capital, management or clinical skills needed to make an ACO successful. But how will aging services organizations fit in with the ACO movement? What should aging services organization leaders understand about this new movement? This event addresses these questions and outlines the whys and wherefores of ACOs; including the serious questions about the strategic implications of becoming accountable for the cost of care for communities. How will these

ACO arrangements be structured, financially? What’s the business model for success? What capabilities must any organization have to buy or build, in order to be a successful ACO? Where is this all headed, long-term? Be prepared to ask some hard questions about “accountable care” at your next board discussion. Session covers the thinking behind ACOs, some surprising facts about early pilots of this concept, up-to-date information about how ACOs are to be implemented, and most importantly, the views of some serious ACO skeptics.

Presented by the partners of ORBoardworks, James L. Reinertsen, MD and James E. Orlikoff, recognized experts in health care governance and leadership.
